

They finally jump into the boxes as the music comes to and end.

WARDEN GILMORE and a two WORKMEN enter.

GILMORE

(with a sinister tone)

Alright, you know the routine. Deliver this shipment to the usual place. And no slip ups. These toy soldiers are the biggest money maker we have.

Gilmore takes a wad of bills out of his pocket and counts out several to the First Workman. Gilmore exits.

The lights fade as the Workmen slide the boxes that are holding Crawford and Bunk off stage.

NO. 5 - "PRISONER'S MARCH" (PLAYOFF)

BLACKOUT TO:

SCENE 4

ANGBERD'S TOY EMPORIUM. - MADISON AVENUE. - SOMETIME LATER.

Angberd's is the most exclusive toy store in New York. The lavishly decorated showroom is filled with eager Christmas shoppers. Among them is the very conspicuous owner of the store, COSMO T. ANGBERD. He is an odd fellow and moves happily among the people playing with his beloved yo-yo with childish exuberance. His wardrobe is tasteless: a powder blue leisure suit that was out of style by 1975, white paten leather shoes and a wide collared, polyester shirt with a large and garrish print pattern. The shirt is unbuttoned half way down to reveal an array of cheap, fake, gold chains around his neck. His hair is slicked back in a 1950's style duck tail. He comes off as happy and likeable in his toy land fantasy. By his side is BUBBLES.

She is the stereotypical floozy who coos over every word and every move Angberd makes. She is dressed in leopard skin spandex pants, high heels and a cheap imitation fur jacket. Her hair is teased high above her overly made up face. She chews her chewing gum and looks at Angberd performing his yo-yo tricks with worshipping adulation. She is without any hard edges and is very likeable.
